How MSN works

When you dial into MSN, you're calling a network provider. Network providers have local nodes in cities and towns all over the world that allow you to make a local phone call to connect to MSN.

The network provider then connects you to the MSN Data Center over a very high-speed network. This network is much faster than connecting over phone lines, so at any time during your session on MSN, the slowest link in the chain is between your modem and the network provider's modem.

The MSN Data Center is where all of the actual information exchange takes place, whether you're chatting with someone in another city or another country, reading messages on your favorite bulletin board, or scanning the day's headlines.

Saving money by working offline

You can reduce the amount of time you need to be connected to MSN by working offline.
