

At night, some of the surplus electricity produced by conventional power stations is used to drive pumps to lift water from a low reservoir into a high reservoir. During the day, when there is a sudden surge in demand for electricity, the water is allowed to flow through tunnels from the high reservoir back down to the low reservoir powering turbines which generate electricity.

An example of this type of hydroelectric power station was built at Dinorwig, in North Wales.