

And first as a quail. I take it in this own first, because in the broad aspect of it—through all time, it is more than any thing else. It angers those who are the cause of it. It is not a game to the Crusader, or the pressed sailor; but neither of them are the cause of it.
To the King or governor who determines that war shall be; and to the young soldiers who voluntarily adopt it as their profession, it has always been more a pastime than anything else: it is pursued and chiefly entered into, because men have nothing else to do.
And this is ~~so~~ true without any exception. No King whose mind was fully occupied with the development of the resources of his Kingdom, or with any other ^{worldly} ~~judicial~~ and sufficient subject of thought, ever entered into one but on compulsion, and no youth, who was earnestly busy with any noble subject of study or action, ever voluntarily became a soldier. (occupy your own mind)
