

Hello fellow Nautilus fans. I'm Jeff Morgan. Some of my photographs have been featured in previous issues of Nautilus, so some of you may feel like you know me already. I have been asked to tell you something about myself, so here goes. I'm British, as you may have guessed from my accent. I was born and raised in a Welsh coal mining village. I've enjoyed the experience of living in many different places, including three years in Germany. Technical things like computers, electronics, and ham radio have always been interesting to me. I enjoy both the technical and the artistic aspects of photography as well. Landscape photography is my first love, except for my wife of course. I take every opportunity to capture the changing moods of nature on film. I really enjoy photographing rolling hills and valleys. Other photographers laugh at my description of it as lumpy landscape. In fact, we're just getting ready to go out on the motorcycle now in search of more lumpy landscape. I find photography to be a restful and rewarding pastime. My favorite times of the day to go out shooting are at dawn and dusk. I will often go to great lengths to get the light just right. On a more personal note, for the last five years I've lived in Afton, Minnesota near the St. Croix river. I enjoy canoeing, motorcycling, traveling, camping, and having good times with my friends.
